It is the third largest city in the country after the capital Skopje and Monastery. In the 14th century, Tetovo, like many other cities in the region, joined the Ottoman Empire. With the Turkish domination, many changes and innovations were seen in the city. In the city, which started to develop in terms of trade, new buildings, and structures such as baths were established. This period also enabled the Muslim population in Tetovo to increase and become the dominant population. In connection with the situation in question, many mosques, masjids, and religious buildings were established in the city. Alaca Mosque, built in 1438, is important in many ways. During the Ottoman Empire, Tetovo was not only an important trade center, but also came to the fore in terms of agriculture and craft. In addition to these, the city also had the feature of a military base. With the declaration of independence of Macedonia from the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in 1991, Tetovo has come to the present day within the independent Republic of Macedonia. Among the places to see in and around Tetovo decorated by the Pena River, the old castle, the Leşok Monastery, the historical stone bridge, the Alaca Mosque, an original architectural work built in the 1400s with its colorful decorations, the old Turkish Bath serving as an art gallery by the Pena River, are available.
